Mankind Steadily Improving in Bodily Strength and Vigor. It is a fact beyond dispute that the man of the present day is stronger, healthier and less liable to attacks of disease, than in any preceding age. There are no more real diseases than there were a hundred years ago, but, with our increasing knowledge, we are able to observe differences not then noted, and to separate into distinct diseases, each requiring different treatment, certain affections which were formerly grouped together under one general name. Pneumonia, for instance, was rarely heard of in former times, but "lung fever" was none the less' fatal, and even more to be dreaded in the absence of any rational method of treatment. Before the general use of the microscope and chemical rengents for testing the urine, diabetes. Bright's disease, and many others were not thoroughly differentiated, but were called by the general name of kidney trouble, and were just as common as in these modern times when safe and infallible cures are advertised for sale at every drug store. The forms of brain disease accompanied by paralysis were in existence long before the term paresis was introduced into the medical vocabulary, and the victim of alcoholic dementia is not favored with the sight of any more zoological curiosities than his predecessor who merely had the common jim-jams.
